A superb and thoughtfully edited collection of ethical writing, both theoretical and applied, containing timeless classics (many revised) and timely contemporary essays on important practical topics.

David Archard, Queen’s University Belfast

Hugh LaFollette, a leading ethicist who is known (and valued) in particular for his contributions to practical ethics, has done a superb job selecting papers for this important anthology.

Christopher Heath Wellman, Washington University in St. Louis

The fourth edition of the highly successful Ethics in Practice offers an impressive collection of 70 new, revised, and classic essays covering 13 key ethical issues. Through the careful selection of essays, thoughtful organization of the sections, and helpful introductions, this book brings together a collection that integrates ethical theory with the discussion of practical ethical issues.

In addition to covering many standard issues such as abortion, euthanasia, animal rights, the environment, and world hunger, the volume includes essays that discuss less familiar, but equally important topics such as hate speech, drug-use, gun control, and political correctness. Half of the essays have been written or revised for this anthology. Eleven essays are new to this edition, and the sections on theory, reproductive technologies, war and terrorism, and animals have all been expanded.

The essays are philosophically rigorous yet engaging and accessible to introductory students, enabling them to think critically about a wide range of moral issues. The supporting website (www.hughlafollette.com/eip4/) contains extensive links to sources on the topics, ethical theories, and guides on writing philosophical papers. Together, these features make Ethics in Practice the ideal volume for introductory and applied ethics courses.

Hugh LaFollette is Marie E. and Leslie Cole Professor in Ethics at the University of South Florida St. Petersburg. He is editor-in-chief of The International Encyclopedia of Ethics (2013, Wiley Blackwell), author of three books, including The Practice of Ethics (2007) and editor of six more in ethics. Most of his published essays have been in ethics, political philosophy, and the philosophy of law.
Ethics in Practice
Each volume in this outstanding series provides an authoritative and comprehensive collection of the essential primary readings from philosophy's main fields of study. Designed to complement the Blackwell Companions to Philosophy series, each volume represents an unparalleled resource in its own right, and will provide the ideal platform for course use.

2. Cahoone: From Modernism to Postmodernism: An Anthology (expanded second edition)
3. LaFollette: Ethics in Practice: An Anthology (third edition)
5. Eze: African Philosophy: An Anthology
7. Kim and Sosa: Metaphysics: An Anthology
12. Kearney and Rasmussen: Continental Aesthetics – Romanticism to Postmodernism: An Anthology
13. Martinich and Sosa: Analytic Philosophy: An Anthology
14. Jacquette: Philosophy of Logic: An Anthology
15. Jacquette: Philosophy of Mathematics: An Anthology
16. Harris, Pratt, and Waters: American Philosophies: An Anthology
17. Emmanuel and Goold: Modern Philosophy – From Descartes to Nietzsche: An Anthology
18. Scharff and Dusek: Philosophy of Technology – The Technological Condition: An Anthology
19. Light and Rolston: Environmental Ethics: An Anthology
20. Taliaferro and Griffiths: Philosophy of Religion: An Anthology
22. John and Lopes: Philosophy of Literature – Contemporary and Classic Readings: An Anthology
23. Cudd and Andreasen: Feminist Theory: A Philosophical Anthology
24. Carroll and Choi: Philosophy of Film and Motion Pictures: An Anthology
25. Lange: Philosophy of Science: An Anthology
27. Curren: Philosophy of Education: An Anthology
28. Shafer-Landau: Ethical Theory: An Anthology
29. Cahn and Meskin: Aesthetics: A Comprehensive Anthology
30. McGrew, Alspector-Kelly and Allhoff: The Philosophy of Science: An Historical Anthology
31. May: Philosophy of Law: Classic and Contemporary Readings
32. Rosenberg and Arp: Philosophy of Biology: An Anthology
34. Martinich and Sosa: Analytic Philosophy: An Anthology (second edition)
36. Hetherington: Metaphysics and Epistemology: A Guided Anthology
38. LaFollette: Ethics in Practice: An Anthology (fourth edition)
Contents

[N]: New to fourth edition; [R]: Revised for Ethics in Practice; [W]: Written for Ethics in Practice

Preface for Instructors x
Acknowledgments xii
Source Acknowledgments xiii
General Introduction 1
Theorizing about Ethics 3
Reading Philosophy 11
Writing a Philosophy Paper [N] 15

Part I Ethical Theory 23

Ethical Theory 25
1 Consequentialism [NR] 28
   William H. Shaw
2 Deontology [W] 37
   David McNaughton and Piers Rawling
3 Rights [NW] 49
   George W. Rainbolt
4 Virtue Theory [W] 60
   Rosalind Hursthouse

Part II Life and Death 71

Euthanasia 73
5 Rule-Utilitarianism and Euthanasia [W] 76
   Brad Hooker
   Tom L. Beauchamp
7 Against the Right to Die [R]
   J. David Velleman
   92
8 Dying at the Right Time: Reflections on (Un)Assisted Suicide [W]
   John Hardwig
   101
9 A Duty to Care Revisited [R]
   Felicia Cohn and Joanne Lynn
   112

Abortion
10 A Defense of Abortion
   Judith Jarvis Thomson
   124
11 On the Moral and Legal Status of Abortion [R]
   Mary Anne Warren
   132
12 An Argument that Abortion is Wrong [W]
   Don Marquis
   141
13 The Moral Permissibility of Abortion
   Margaret Olivia Little
   151
14 Virtue Theory and Abortion [R]
   Rosalind Hursthouse
   160

Animals
15 All Animals are Equal
   Peter Singer
   172
16 Moral Standing, the Value of Lives, and Speciesism
   R. G. Frey
   181
17 The Case for Animal Rights
   Tom Regan
   192
18 The Case for the Use of Animals in Biomedical Research [N]
   Carl Cohen
   198
19 Why Cohen is Mistaken [NR]
   Hugh LaFollette
   204

Part III The Personal Life
217

Family and Sexuality
20 What Do Grown Children Owe Their Parents?
   Jane English
   219
21 Morality, Parents, and Children
   James Rachels
   223
22 Missing Staircases and the Marriage Debate: Is Same-Sex Marriage Bad for Children? [NR]
   John Corvino
   233
23 What Is Marriage For? Children Need Mothers and Fathers [N]
   Maggie Gallagher
   239
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Chapter</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Author(s)</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>24</td>
<td>Artificial Means of Reproduction and Our Understanding of the Family</td>
<td>Ruth Macklin</td>
<td>247</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25</td>
<td>Is Women’s Labor a Commodity?</td>
<td>Elizabeth S. Anderson</td>
<td>255</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>26</td>
<td>“Goodbye Dolly?” The Ethics of Human Cloning</td>
<td>John Harris</td>
<td>265</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>27</td>
<td>The Wisdom of Repugnance: Why We Should Ban the Cloning of Humans</td>
<td>Leon R. Kass</td>
<td>274</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>28</td>
<td>Cognitive Enhancement</td>
<td>Allen Buchanan and David R. Crawford [NW]</td>
<td>283</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Part IV  Liberty and Equality</td>
<td></td>
<td>291</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>29</td>
<td>Freedom of Action</td>
<td>John Stuart Mill</td>
<td>295</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>30</td>
<td>On Improving People by Political Means</td>
<td>Lester H. Hunt</td>
<td>299</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>31</td>
<td>Against the Legalization of Drugs</td>
<td>James Q. Wilson</td>
<td>309</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>32</td>
<td>Why We Should Decriminalize Drug Use [R]</td>
<td>Douglas Husak</td>
<td>314</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>33</td>
<td>The Liberal Basis of the Right to Bear Arms [R]</td>
<td>Todd C. Hughes and Lester H. Hunt</td>
<td>323</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>34</td>
<td>Gun Control</td>
<td>Hugh LaFollette</td>
<td>334</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Free Speech</td>
<td></td>
<td>346</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35</td>
<td>Freedom of Thought and Discussion</td>
<td>John Stuart Mill</td>
<td>348</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>36</td>
<td>“The Price We Pay?” Pornography and Harm [R]</td>
<td>Susan J. Brison</td>
<td>352</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>37</td>
<td>The Right to Get Turned On: Pornography, Autonomy, Equality</td>
<td>Andrew Altman</td>
<td>361</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>38</td>
<td>Sticks and Stones [W]</td>
<td>John Arthur</td>
<td>370</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>39</td>
<td>Speech Codes and Expressive Harm [W]</td>
<td>Andrew Altman</td>
<td>381</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Sexual and Racial Discrimination

40 Racism

   Michele Moody-Adams

41 Servility and Self-Respect

   Thomas E. Hill, Jr.

42 Sexual Harassment

   Anita M. Superson

43 Date Rape

   Lois Pineau

44 Men in Groups: Collective Responsibility for Rape [R]

   Larry May and Robert Strikwerda

Affirmative Action

45 The Case against Affirmative Action [R]

   Louis P. Pojman

46 The Rights of Allan Bakke

   Ronald Dworkin

47 Affirmative Action as Equalizing Opportunity:
   Challenging the Myth of “Preferential Treatment” [W]

   Luke Charles Harris and Uma Narayan

Part V  Justice

Punishment

48 Punishment and Desert [W]

   James Rachels

49 Out of Character: On the Psychology of Excuses in the Criminal Law [W]

   John M. Doris

50 Does Punishment Work? [W]

   John Paul Wright, Francis T. Cullen, and Kevin M. Beaver

51 In Defense of the Death Penalty

   Louis P. Pojman

52 Against the Death Penalty

   Jeffrey Reiman

Economic Justice

53 A Theory of Justice

   John Rawls

54 The Entitlement Theory of Justice

   Robert Nozick

55 Displacing the Distributive Paradigm

   Iris Marion Young
CONTENTS

56 Economic Competition: Should We Care about the Losers? [W]
Jonathan Wolff

World Hunger

57 Famine, Affluence, and Morality
Peter Singer

58 Famine Relief and the Ideal Moral Code [W]
John Arthur

59 Eradicating Systemic Poverty: Brief for a Global Resources Dividend [R]
Thomas W. Pogge

60 Feeding People versus Saving Nature [R]
Holmes Rolston III

Environment

61 The Value of Nature [NW]
Ronald Sandler

62 A Place for Cost-Benefit Analysis [R]
David Schmidtz

63 Ideals of Human Excellence and Preserving Natural Environments
Thomas E. Hill, Jr.

64 A Perfect Moral Storm: Climate Change, Intergenerational Ethics, and the Problem of Moral Corruption [NR]
Stephen M. Gardiner

War, Terrorism, and Reconciliation

65 Is the War on Terrorism a Defense of Civilization? [N]
Stephen Nathanson

66 Just War Doctrine and the Military Response to Terrorism [R]
Joseph Boyle

67 Nipping Evil in the Bud: The Questionable Ethics of Preventive Force [W]
Douglas P. Lackey

68 The Justifiability of Humanitarian Intervention [R]
Charles R. Beitz

69 Pacifism: Reclaiming the Moral Presumption [W]
William J. Hawk

70 Political Reconciliation [NR]
Colleen Murphy
This anthology seeks to provide engagingly written, carefully argued philosophical essays, on a wide range of important, contemporary ethical issues. When I had trouble finding essays that suited those purposes, I commissioned new essays – four for this edition. I also invited a number of philosophers to revise their “classic” essays – three for this edition, with four reprints new to this edition. Altogether, more than half of the essays were written or revised specifically for Ethics in Practice. This edition also features a new introductory essay, “Writing a Philosophy Paper.”

The result is a tasty blend of the old and the new, the familiar and the unfamiliar. I have organized the book into five thematic sections and fifteen topics to give you the greatest flexibility to construct the course you want. When feasible, I begin or end sections with essays that bridge to preceding or following sections.

Although I have included essays I think introductory students can read and comprehend, no one would believe me if I claimed all the essays are easy to read. We all know many students have trouble reading philosophical essays. That is not surprising. Many of these essays were written originally for other professional philosophers, not first-year undergraduates. Moreover, even when philosophers write expressly for introductory audiences, their ideas, vocabularies, and styles are often foreign to the introductory student. So I have included a brief introduction on Reading Philosophy to advise students on how to read and understand philosophical essays.

I want this volume to be suitable for a variety of courses. The most straightforward way to use the text is to assign essays on six of seven of your favorite practical issues. If you want a more topical course, you could emphasize issues in one or more of the major thematic sections. You could also focus on practical and theoretical issues spanning individual topics and major divisions of the book. If, for instance, you want to focus on gender, you could select most essays from four sections: Abortion, Family and Sexuality, Sexual and Racial Discrimination, and Affirmative Action, and combine these with some specific articles scattered throughout, for example, Young’s “Displacing the Distributive Paradigm” (Economic Justice). Finally, you can also give your course a decided theoretical flavor by using the section on Ethical Theory, and then selecting essays that address, in diverse contexts, significant theoretical issues like the act/omission distinction, the determination of moral status, or the limits of morality, and so on. You can also direct your students to Theorizing about Ethics – a brief introductory essay designed to help them understand why we should theorize, and then giving them a snapshot of some major theories.

One distinctive feature of the anthology is the section introductions. Some anthologies do not include them. Those that do often use introductions simply to summarize the articles in that section. The introductions here do indicate the main thrust of the essays. However, that is not their primary purpose. Their purpose is (1) to focus students’ attention on the theoretical issues at stake, and (2) to relate those issues to the discussion of the same or related issues in other sections. All too often students (and philosophers) see practical ethics as a hodgepodge of largely (or wholly) unrelated problems. The introductions should go some way toward remedying this tendency. They show students that practical questions are not discrete, but intricately connected with one another. Thinking carefully about any problem invariably illuminates (and is illuminated by) others. Thus, the overarching aim of these introductions is to give the book a coherence some anthologies lack.
There are consequences of this strategy you might mention to your students. I organized the order of the papers within each section to maximize the students’ understanding of that practical issue – nothing more. However, I wrote the introductions and organized the summaries to maximize the understanding of theoretical issues. Often the order of the discussion of essays in the introduction matches the order of essays in that section; occasionally it does not. Moreover, I spend more time “summarizing” some essays to the exclusion of others. That in no way suggests that the essays on which I focus are more cogent, useful, or in any way better than the others. Rather, I found it easier to use them as entrées into the theoretical questions.

Finally, since I do not know which sections you will use, you should be aware that the introductions will likely refer to essays the student will not read. When that happens, they will not realize one aim of the introductions. They may still be valuable. For even if the student does not read the essays to which an introduction refers, she can better appreciate the interconnections between issues. It might even have the delicious consequence of encouraging the student to read an essay that you did not assign.

One last note about the criteria for selecting essays. Many practical ethics anthologies include essays on opposing sides of every issue. For most topics I think that is a laudable aim that an editor can normally achieve. But not always. I include essays that discuss the issue as we currently frame and understand it. Sometimes that understanding precludes some positions that might have once been part of the debate. For instance, early practical ethics anthologies included essays that argued that an individual should always choose to prolong her life, by any medical means whatever. On this view, euthanasia of any sort and for any reason was immoral. Although that was once a viable position, virtually no one now advocates or even discusses it. Even the author of the essay with serious misgivings about a “right to die” would not embrace that position. The current euthanasia debate largely concerns when people might choose not to sustain their lives, how they might carry out their wishes, and with whose assistance. Those are the questions addressed by these essays on euthanasia.

Likewise, I do not have any essays that argue that women and Blacks ought to be relegated to the bedroom or to manual labor. Although everyone acknowledges that racism and sexism are still alive and well in the United States, few people openly advocate making Blacks and women second class citizens. No one seriously discusses these proposals in academic circles. Instead, I include essays that highlight current issues concerning the treatment of minorities and women (sexual harassment, date rape, etc.).
Acknowledgments

I would like to thank three people who, through their work, encouraged me to think about practical moral issues, and who through their lives, encouraged me to act on what I found: Joel Feinberg, James Rachels, and Richard Wasserstrom.

I would like to thank Eva LaFollette for insight and her comments on the structure and content of this volume.

I would like to thank Jeff Dean, who is everything one could possibly want in an editor. He is knowledgeable, thoughtful, and efficient. I will miss his presence at the press. Finally I would like to the staff at Wiley-Blackwell for making my job as editor easier. My copy editor, Helen Kemp, was superb.
The editor and publisher gratefully acknowledge the permission granted to reproduce the copyright material in this book and that appear in the following chapters:

January–February 1991. Reprinted with permission of John Wiley & Sons Ltd.

31 James Q. Wilson, “Against the Legalization of Drugs,” from Commentary (February 1990). Reprinted by permission. All rights reserved.

All of us make choices. Some of these appear to concern only ourselves: what to wear, when to sleep, what to read, where to live, how to decorate our homes, and what to eat. Under most circumstances these choices are purely personal. Purely personal concerns are beyond the scope of morality and will not be discussed in this book. Other choices demonstrably affect others: whether to prolong the life of our comatose grandmother, when and with whom to have sex, how to relate to people of different races, and whether to support capital punishment or laws against cloning. These choices clearly affect others and are normally thought to be choices we should assess, at least in part, on moral grounds.

Upon closer examination, however, we see that it is not always obvious whether a choice affects only us. Is choosing to view pornography personal or does it support the degradation of women? Is eating meat purely personal or does it encourage and sustain the inhumane treatment of animals or the depletion of resources that we could use to feed the starving? Is choosing where to live purely personal or does it sometimes support racist practices that confine African Americans or Hispanics or Asians to inadequate housing? If so, then some choices that seem purely personal turn out to affect others in morally significant ways.

In short, once we reflect carefully on our choices, we discover that many might profoundly affect others and, therefore, that we ought to evaluate them morally. By choosing to buy a new stereo rather than send money for famine relief, children in India may starve. By choosing to support political candidates who oppose or support abortion, tough drug laws, affirmative action, or environmental protection, I affect others in demonstrably significant ways. Of course knowing that our choices affect others does not yet tell us how we should behave. It does, however, confirm that we should evaluate those choices morally. Unfortunately many of us are individually and collectively nearsighted: we fail to see or appreciate the moral significance of our choices, thereby increasing the evil in the world. Often we talk and think as if evil resulted solely from the conscious choices of wholly evil people. I suspect, however, that evil results more often from ignorance and inattention: we just don’t notice or attend to the significance of what we do. A central aim of this book is to improve our moral vision: to help us notice and comprehend the moral significance of what we do.

The primary means of achieving this end is to present essays that carefully and critically discuss a range of practical moral issues. These essays will supply information you likely do not have and perspectives you may not have considered. Many of you may find that your education has ill prepared you to think carefully about these issues. Far too many public schools in the United States neither expect nor even permit students to think critically. Many of them will not have expected or wanted you to develop and defend your own views. Instead, many will have demanded that you memorize the content of your texts and the assertions of your teachers.

Philosophy professors, in contrast, do not standardly expect you to memorize what they or someone else says. Still less will they want you to parrot them or the texts. They require you to read what others have said, but not because they want you to recite it. Instead, these professors contend that critically reading the arguments of others will help you better attain your own conclusions. For those of you who find that your high school education, with its premium on memorization and blind adherence to authority, did not prepare you to read philosophical essays, I have included a brief section on Reading Philosophy.

I also include a brief introductory essay on ethical theorizing. Philosophers do not discuss practical issues in a vacuum. They place their discussions in a larger context that helps clarify and define the practical issues. They discuss not only the details peculiar to the issue, but more general features that are relevant to many practical moral quandaries. That essay will explain the purpose of Theorizing about Ethics. The essay will also briefly describe some prominent ethical theories that you will encounter in these pages. You will see, as you read individual essays, that some authors provide detailed explanations of these theories.

I also include an introductory essay on Writing a Philosophy Paper. Some of what I say will overlap themes from several of the earlier introductions. However, since I know not all teachers will assign, and not all students will read, all of the introductions, I think this is unavoidable. My aim is to briefly describe a variety of papers you might be asked to write, and talk about what you should do to make your papers as strong as possible.

Finally, to augment your familiarity with various theories, I will, in the introductions to each section, not only summarize the central themes of the essays, I will also spotlight some general theoretical questions and explain how these are relevant to other issues discussed in this volume. It is important to appreciate the myriad ways in which practical moral issues are woven together by common theoretical threads. Practical ethics is not a random collection of unconnected issues, but a systematic exploration of how we can most responsibly act in a variety of practical moral contexts.

Consequently, this is not a recipe book that answers all moral questions. Rather, it is a chronicle of how a number of philosophers have thought about these practical moral issues. If you absorb the information the authors supply, attend to their arguments, and consider the diverse perspectives they offer, you will find, when the course is over, that you are better able to think carefully and critically about practical and theoretical moral issues.
Theorizing about Ethics

When deciding what to do, we often face uncertainty over, confusions about, or conflicts between, our inclinations, desires, interests, and beliefs. These can arise even when we want to promote only our self-interests. We may not know what is in our best interests: we may have simply adopted some mistaken ideas of our parents, our friends, or our culture. For instance, were our parents Nazis we might believe that maintaining racial purity is our most important personal aim. We may also confuse our wants with our interests: we want to manipulate others for our own ends and therefore infer that caring for others systematically undermines our interests. Even when we know some of our interests, we may be unable to determine their relative importance: we may assume that wealth is more important than developing character and having close relationships. Other times we may know our interests, but be unsure of how to resolve conflicts between them: I may need to write a paper, yet want to hike the local mountain. Finally, even if I know the best choice, I may not act on it: I may know that it is in my best long-term interest to lose weight, yet inhale that scrumptious pie instead.

These complications show why I can best pursue my self-interests only if I rationally deliberate about them. I must sometimes step back and think more abstractly about (a) what it means for something to be an interest (rather than a desire), (b) how to detect which behavior or goals are most likely to advance those interests, and (c) how to understand the interconnections between my interests (e.g., the ways that health enhances my chance of achieving other interests). Finally, I must (d) find a procedure for coping with conflicts between interests, and (e) learn how to act on the outcome of my rational deliberations. Abstraction from and theorizing about practice improves practice and helps us act more prudently.

Of course, many actions do not concern simply ourselves; they also affect others. Some of my actions benefit others while others harm them. The benefit or harm may be direct or indirect, intentional or unintentional. I might directly harm Joe by pushing him. I might push him because I am angry with him or because I want his place in the queue. I could indirectly harm Joe by landing a promotion he needs to finance nursing care for his dying mother. Or I might offend Joe by privately engaging in what he considers kinky sex. If so, my bedroom antics affect him, although only indirectly and only because he holds the particular moral beliefs he does. Arguably it is inappropriate to say that I harmed Joe in these last two cases, although I did choose to act knowing my actions might make him unhappy or nauseated.

In choosing how to behave, I should acknowledge that my actions may affect others, even if only indirectly. In these circumstances, I must choose whether to pursue my self-interest or whether to promote (or at least not set back) the interests of others. Other times I must choose to act in ways that may harm some while benefitting others. If I am fortunate, I might occasionally find ways to promote everyone’s interests without harming anyone else’s.

Understanding these distinctions does not settle the question of how I should act. It only circumscribes the arena within which morality operates. Morality, traditionally understood, involves primarily, and perhaps exclusively, behavior that affects others. I say “perhaps” because some philosophers (e.g., Kant) thought that anyone who harms herself, for instance, by squandering her talents or abusing her body, has done something morally wrong. For present purposes, though, we can set this issue aside. For what everyone acknowledges is that actions that indisputably affect others should be evaluated morally – although we might disagree about how that should shape our action. We might also disagree about whether and to what extent actions that affect others only indirectly should be evaluated morally. We might further disagree about whether and how to morally distinguish direct from indirect harm. Nonetheless, if someone’s action directly and substantially affects others (either benefits or harms them), then even if we do not yet know whether the action is right or wrong, we can agree that we should evaluate it morally.

This discussion might suggest that most, if not all, moral decisions are complicated or confusing. Not so. Many moral “decisions” are so easy that we never think about them. No one seriously asks whether it is morally permissible to drug a classmate so she can have sex with him, whether she should steal money from her co-workers to finance a vacation on the Riviera, or whether she should knowingly infect someone with AIDS. This is not the stuff of which moral disagreement is made. We know quite well that such actions are wrong. I suspect most moral questions are so easily answered that we never ask them. Rather than discuss questions to which there are obvious answers, we focus on, think about, and debate those about which there is genuine disagreement.

However, we sometimes think a decision is easy to make, when, in fact, it is not. This is an equally (or arguably more) serious mistake. We may fail to see the conflicts, confusions, or uncertainties: the issue may be so complicated that we overlook, fail to understand, or do not appreciate how (and how profoundly) our actions affect others. If we are preoccupied with our self-interest, we may not see the ways our behavior significantly affects others or else we give inadequate weight to their interests. Finally, our unquestioning acceptance of the moral status quo can blind us to just how wrong some of our behaviors and social institutions are.

The Need for Theory

We may think that an action is grossly immoral, but not really know why. Or we may think we know why, only to discover, upon careful examination, that we are merely parroting the “reasons” offered by our friends, teachers, parents, or preachers. There is nothing wrong with considering how others think and how they have decided similar moral questions. We would be fools not to absorb and benefit from the wisdom of others. However, anyone even faintly aware of history will acknowledge that collective moral wisdom, like individual moral wisdom, is sometimes horribly mistaken. Our ancestors held slaves, denied women the right to vote, practiced genocide, and burned witches at the stake. I suspect most of our ancestors were generally morally decent people who were firmly convinced that their actions were moral. They acted wrongly because they failed to be sufficiently self-critical. They did not evaluate their own beliefs; they unquestioningly adopted the outlook of their ancestors, political leaders, teachers, friends, and community. In these ways they are not unique. This is a “sin” of which each of us is guilty. The resounding lesson of history is that we must scrutinize our beliefs, our choices, and our actions to ensure that we are informed, consistent, imaginative, unbiased, and not mindlessly reciting the views and vices of others. Otherwise we may perpetrate evils we could avoid, evils for which future generations will rightly condemn us.

To critically evaluate our moral views we should theorize about ethics: we should think about moral issues more abstractly, more coherently, and more consistently. Theorizing is not some enterprise divorced from practice, but is simply the careful, systematic, and thoughtful reflection on practice. Theorizing will not insulate us from error. However, it will empower us to shed ill-conceived, uninformed, and irrelevant considerations. To explain what I mean, let’s think briefly about a matter dear to most students: grades. My grading of students’ work can go awry in at least three different ways.

1. I might use an inconsistent grading standard. That is, I might use different standards for different students: Joan gets an A because she has a pleasant smile; Ralph, because he works hard; Rachel, because her paper was exceptional. Of course knowing that I should use a unified grading standard does not tell me what standards I should have employed or what grades the specific students should have received. Perhaps they all deserved the As they received. However, it is not enough that I accidentally gave them the grades they deserved. I should have given them A’s because they deserved them, not because of some irrelevant considerations. If I employed irrelevant considerations, I will often give students the wrong grades, even if, in some cases, I give them the correct grades.

2. I might be guided by improper grading standards. It is not enough that I have an invariant standard. I might have a flawed standard to which I adhere unwaveringly. For instance, I might consistently give students I like higher grades than students I dislike. If so, then I grade their work inappropriately, even if consistently.
I might employ the standards inappropriately. I might have appropriate and consistent grading standards, yet misapply them because I am ignorant, close-minded, exhausted, preoccupied, or inattentive.

I can make parallel mistakes in ethical deliberations:

1. I might use inconsistent ethical principles.
2. I might have inappropriate moral standards.
3. I might employ moral standards inappropriately.

Let us look at each deliberative error in more detail:

1. Consistency. We should treat two creatures the same unless they are relevantly different – different in ways that justify treating them differently. Just as students expect teachers to grade consistently, we expect others (and hopefully ourselves) to be morally consistent. The demand for consistency pervades moral thinking. A common strategy for defending our moral views is to claim that we are consistent; a common strategy for criticizing others’ views is to charge that they are not.

   The argumentative role of consistency is evident in the discussion of every practical moral issue. Consider its role in the Abortion debate. Disputants spend considerable effort arguing that their own positions are consistent while charging that their opponents’ positions are inconsistent. Each side labors to show why abortion is (or is not) relevantly similar to standard cases of murder. Most of those who think abortion is immoral (and likely all of those who think it should be illegal) claim abortion is relevantly similar to murder, while those who think abortion should be legal claim it differs relevantly from murder. What we do not find are people who think abortion is murder and yet wholly moral.

   Consistency likewise plays central roles in debates over Free Speech and Paternalism and Risk. Those opposed to censorship often argue that books, pictures, movies, plays, or sculptures that some people want to censor are relevantly similar to art that most people do not want censored. They further claim that pornography is a form of speech, and if we can prohibit it because the majority finds it offensive, then we must censor any speech that offends the majority. Conversely, those who claim we can legitimately censor pornography go to some pains to explain why pornography is relevantly different from other forms of speech we want to protect. Both sides want to show that their position is consistent and that their opponent’s position is inconsistent.

Although consistency is generally recognized as a requirement of morality, in specific cases it is difficult to detect if someone is being (in)consistent. Someone may appear to act (in)consistently, but only because we do not appreciate the complexity of her moral reasoning or fail to understand the morally relevant features framing her action. Nonetheless, what everyone acknowledges is that if someone is being inconsistent, then that is a compelling reason to reject her position.

2. Correct principles. It is not enough to be consistent. We must also employ the appropriate guidelines, principles, standards, or make the appropriate judgments. Theorizing about ethics is one good way to discern the best (most defensible) standards or guidelines, to identify the morally relevant features of our actions, to enhance our ability to make good judgments. Later I discuss how to select and defend these principles – how we determine what is morally relevant.

3. Correct “application.” Even when we know what is morally relevant, and even when we reason consistently, we may still make moral mistakes. Consider the ways I might misapply rules prohibiting (a) lying and (b) harming another’s feelings. Suppose my wife comes home wearing a gaudy sweater. She wants to know if I like it. Presumably I should neither lie nor intentionally hurt her feelings. What, in these circumstances, should I do? There are a number of ways I might act inappropriately.

   1. I may not see viable alternatives: I may assume, for example, that I must baldly lie or else substantially hurt her feelings.
   2. I may be insufficiently attentive to her needs and interests: I may over- or under-estimate how much she will be hurt by my honesty (or lack of it).
   3. I may be unduly influenced by self-interest or personal bias: I may lie not to protect her feelings, but because I don’t want her to be angry with me.
   4. I may know precisely what I should do, but be insufficiently motivated to do it: I may lie because I just don’t want the hassle.
   5. Or, I may be motivated to act as I should, but lack the talent or skill to do it: I may want to be honest, but lack the verbal and personal skills to be honest in a way that will not hurt her feelings.

   These are all failings with practical moral significance. We would all be better off if we would learn how to make ourselves more attentive, more informed, and better motivated. However, although these are vitally important practical concerns, they are not the primary focus of most essays in this book. What these authors do here is provide relevant information, careful logical analysis, and a clear account of what they take to be the morally relevant features of practical ethical questions.

Is It Just a Matter of Opinion?

Many of you may find talk of moral standards – and the employment of those standards – troubling. You may think – certainly many people talk as if they think – that moral judgments are just “matters of opinion.” All of us have overheard people conclude a debate about a contentious moral issue by saying: “Well, it is all just a matter of opinion anyway!” I suspect the real function of this claim is to signal the speaker’s desire to terminate discussion. Unfortunately this claim implies more. It suggests that since moral judgments are just opinions, then all moral judgments are equally good (or equally bad). It implies that we cannot criticize or rationally scrutinize our (or anyone else’s) moral judgments. After all, we don’t rationally criticize mere opinions (“I think Dominos serves the best pizza in town” or “I prefer purple walls in a kitchen”).

However, even if no (contentious) moral judgment were indisputably correct, we should not infer that all moral judgments are equally (un)reliable. Although we have no clear way of deciding with certainty which actions are best, we have excellent ways of showing that some actions are morally defective. For instance, we know that moral judgments based on misinformation, shortsightedness, bias, lack of understanding, or wholly bizarre moral principles are flawed. Conversely, judgments are more plausible if they are based on full information, careful calculation, astute perception, and if they have successfully survived the criticism of others in the marketplace of ideas.

Consider the following analogy: No grammatical or stylistic rules will determine precisely the way I should phrase the next sentence. However, from that we should not conclude that I may properly use just any string of words. Some arrangements of words are not sentences and some grammatically complete sentences are gibberish. Other sentences might be grammatically well formed – even stylish – yet inappropriate because they are disconnected from the sentences that precede or follow them. Many other sentences are grammatically well formed, relevant, and minimally clear, yet may be vague or imprecise. Others may be comprehensible, relevant, and generally precise, yet still be gaudy or at least bereft of style. Still others may be wholly adequate, sufficiently adequate so that there is no strong reason to prefer one. A few may be brilliant. No grammar book will enable us to make those distinctions or identify a uniquely best sentence. Nonetheless, we have no problem distinguishing the trashy or the unacceptably vague from the linguistically sublime. In short, we needn’t think that one sentence is uniquely good to acknowledge that some are better and some are worse. Likewise for ethics. We may not always know how to act; we may find substantial disagreement about some highly contentious ethical issues. However, that does not show that all moral views are created equal (LaFollette, 1991).

We should also not ignore the obvious fact that circumstances often demand that we act even if there is no (or we cannot discern a) uniquely appropriate moral action. Nonetheless, our uncertainty does not lead us to think that – or act as if – all views were equal. We do not toss a coin to decide whether to remove our parents from life support, whether to save a small child drowning in a pond, or whether someone charged with a felony is guilty. We (should) strive to make an informed decision based on the best evidence and then act accordingly, even if the best evidence does not guarantee certainty. To make an informed decision we should understand the relevant issues, take a longer-term perspective, set aside irrational biases, and inculcate a willingness to subject our tentative conclusions to the criticisms of others.

We should not bemoan our inability to be certain that we have found the uniquely best action; we must simply make the best choice we can. We should, of course, acknowledge our uncertainty, admit our fallibility, and be prepared to consider new ideas, especially when they are supported by strong arguments. However, we have no need to embrace any pernicious forms of relativism. That would be not only misguided, but a moral mistake.

The Role of Theory

Even when people agree that an issue should be evaluated by criteria of morality, they may disagree about how to evaluate it. Using the language of the previous section, they may disagree about the best principles or judgments, about how those are to be interpreted, or about how they should be used. Anti-abortionists argue that abortion should be illegal because the fetus has the same right to life as a normal adult, while pro-abortionists argue that it should be legal since the woman has the right to decide what happens in and to her body. Supporters of capital punishment argue that executions deter crime, while opponents argue that it is cruel and inhumane. Those who want to censor pornography claim it degrades women, while supporters argue that it is a form of free speech that should be protected by law.

In giving reasons for their judgments, people cite some features of the action they think explain or support their evaluation. This function of reasons is not confined to ethical disagreements. I may justify my claim that "Fargo is a good movie" by claiming that it has well-defined characters, an interesting plot, and the appropriate dramatic tension. That is, I identify features of the movie that I think justify my evaluation. The features I cite, however, are not unique to this movie. In giving these reasons I imply that "having well-defined characters" or "having an interesting plot" or "having the appropriate dramatic tension" are important characteristics of good movies, period. That is not to say these are the only or the most important characteristics. Nor is it yet to decide how weighty these characteristics are. It is, however, to say that we have a reason to think that a movie with these characteristics is a good movie.

You can challenge my evaluation of the movie in three ways: You can challenge my criteria, the weight I give those criteria, or my claim that the movie satisfies them. For instance, you could argue that having well-defined characters is not a relevant criterion, that I have given that criterion too much weight, or, that Fargo does not have well-defined characters. In defense, I could explain why it is a relevant criterion, why I have given the criterion the appropriate weight, and why the movie's characters are well developed. At this point we are discussing issues are two different levels. We are debating both the criteria of good movies and how to evaluate a particular movie.

Likewise, when discussing a practical ethical issue, we are discussing not only that particular issue but also underlying theoretical perspectives. We do not want to know only whether capital punishment deters crime, we also want to know whether deterrence is morally important, and, if so, just how important. When theorizing reaches a certain level or complexity, we begin to speak of someone's "having a theory." Ethical theories are simply formal and more systematic discussions of second level, theoretical discussions. These are philosophers' efforts to identify the relevant moral criteria, the weight or significance of each criterion, and to offer some guidance about how to determine whether an action satisfies those criteria. In the next section, I will briefly outline the more familiar ethical theories. But before I do, let me first offer a warning. In thinking about ethical theories, we may be tempted to assume that people who hold the same theory will make the same practical ethical judgments, and that people who make the same practical ethical judgments must embrace the same theory. Neither is true. It is not true of any evaluative judgments. For instance, two people with similar criteria for good movies may differently evaluate Fargo, while two people who loved Fargo may have (somewhat) different criteria for good movies. Likewise for ethics. Two people with different ethical theories may nonetheless agree that abortion is morally permitted (or grossly immoral), while two adherents of the same moral theory may differently evaluate abortion. Knowing someone's theoretical commitments does not tell us precisely what actions she thinks right and wrong. It tells us only how she thinks about moral issues; it identifies her criteria of relevance and the weight she gives to each.

Main Types of Theory

Two broad classes of ethical theory – consequentialist and deontological – have shaped most people's understanding of ethics. Consequentialists hold that we should choose the available action with the best overall consequences, while deontologists hold that we should act in ways circumscribed by moral rules or rights, and that these rules or rights are defined (at least partly) independently of consequences. Since this book includes a separate section on Ethical Theory, this exposition will be brief. Nonetheless, these descriptions should be sufficient to help you understand the broad outlines of each theory.

Consequentialism

Consequentialists claim that we are morally obligated to act in ways that produce the best consequences. It is not difficult to see why this is an appealing theory. It employs the same style of reasoning we use in purely prudential (self-interested) decisions. If you are trying to select a major, you will consider the available options, predict which one will likely lead to the best overall outcome, and then choose that major. If you are trying to decide whether to keep your present job or take a new one, you will consider the consequences of taking each (working conditions, location, salary, chance of advancement, how the change might alter your personal and family relations, etc.), and then choose the one with the best overall consequences.

Despite these similarities, prudence and morality are importantly different. Whereas prudence requires that we wisely advance only our own personal interests, consequentialism requires us to consider the interests of all affected. When facing a moral decision, we should consider available alternative actions, trace the likely consequences of each alternative for all affected, and then select the one with the best overall consequences.

Of course, a consequentialist need not consider every consequence of an action, nor must she consider them all equally. Two consequences of my typing this introduction are that I am strengthening the muscles in my hands and increasing my eye-hand coordination. However, barring unusual circumstances, these are not morally relevant: they are neither a means to nor a constituent of my or anyone else’s welfare, happiness, or well-being. That is why they play no role in moral deliberation. However, different consequentialists profoundly disagree about whether or how much some consequence is morally relevant. That is why any adequate consequentialist theory must specify (a) which consequences are morally relevant (i.e., which we should consider when morally deliberating), and (b) how much weight we should give them.

Utilitarians, for instance, claim we should choose the option that maximizes “the greatest happiness of the greatest number.” They also advocate complete equality: “each to count as one and no more than one.” Of course we might disagree about exactly what it means to maximize the greatest happiness of greatest number; still more we might be unsure about how this is to be achieved. Act utilitarians claim that we determine the rightness of an action if we can decide which action, in those circumstances, would be most likely to promote the greatest happiness of the greatest number. Rule utilitarians reject the idea that moral decisions should be case-by-case (see Hooker, in EUTHANASIA). On their view, we should decide not whether a particular action is likely to promote the greatest happiness of the greatest number, but whether a particular type of action would, if done by everyone (or most people), promote the greatest happiness of the greatest number.

This theory is discussed in more detail by Shaw (ETHICAL THEORY).

Deontology

Deontological theories are most easily understood in contrast to consequentialist theories. Whereas consequentialists claim we should always strive to promote the best consequences, deontologists claim that our moral obligations – whatever they are – are in some ways independent of consequences. Thus, if I have obligations not to kill or steal or lie, those obligations are not justified simply on the ground that following such rules will always produce the best consequences.

That is why many people find deontological theories so attractive. For example, most of us would be offended if someone lied to us, even if the lie produced the greatest happiness for the greatest number. I would certainly be offended if someone killed me, even if my death might produce the greatest happiness for the greatest number (you use my kidneys to save two people’s lives, my heart to save someone else’s life, etc.) The rightness or wrongness of lying or killing cannot be wholly explained, the deontologist claims, by its consequences. Of course deontologists disagree about which rules are true and about how to determine them. Some claim abstract reason shows us how we should act (Kant, 2002). Others talk about discovering principles that are justified in reflective equilibrium (e.g., Rawls, in ECONOMIC JUSTICE), while some claim we should seek principles that might be adopted by an ideal observer (Arthur, in WORLD HUNGER).

These theories are discussed in more detail by McNaughton and Rawling (ETHICAL THEORY).

Alternatives

There are numerous alternatives to these theories. To call them “alternatives” does not imply that they are inferior, only that they have not played the same role in shaping contemporary ethical thought. Two are especially worth mention since they have become highly influential in the past two decades; they also play pivotal roles in several essays in this book.

Virtue theory

Virtue theory predates both consequentialism and deontology as a formal theory. It was the dominant theory of the ancient Greeks, reaching its clearest expression in Aristotle’s Nicomachean Ethics. For many centuries it was neither discussed nor advocated as a serious competitor. But by the late 1950s, it was starting to reappear in the philosophical literature (the history of this re-emergence is traced in the essays reprinted in Crisp and Slote (1997).

Much of the appeal of virtue theory arises from the perceived failings of the standard alternatives. Deontology and consequentialism, virtue theorists claim, put inadequate (or no) emphasis on the agent – on the ways she should be, or the kinds of character she should develop. Relatedly, they fail to give appropriate scope to personal judgment and put too much emphasis on following rules, whether deontological or consequentialistic.

Certainly, on some readings of deontology and utilitarianism, it sounds as if advocates of these theories believed that a moral decision was the mindless application of a moral rule. The rule says: “Be honest,” then we should be honest. The rule says: “Always act to promote the greatest happiness of the greatest number,” then we need only figure that out which action has the most desirable consequences, and then do it. Ethics thus seems to resemble math. The calculations may require patience and care, but they do not depend on judgment.

Many advocates of the standard theories find these objections by virtue theorists telling and, over the past two decades, have modified their respective theories to (partially) accommodate them. The result, says Rosalind Hursthouse, is “that the lines of demarcation between these three approaches have become blurred . . . . Deontology and utilitarianism are no longer perspicuously identified by describing them as emphasizing rules or consequences in contrast to character” (1999, p.4). Both put more emphasis on judgment and character. For instance, Hill, who is a deontologist, describes the proper attitude toward the Environment in a way that emphasizes excellence or character, while May and Strikwerda (Sexual and Racial Discrimination), who do not generally embrace virtue theory, emphasize the need for men to feel shame for their complicity in the rape of women. However, although judgment and character may play increasingly important roles in contemporary versions of deontology or consequentialism, neither plays the central role it does in virtue theory. This is evident, for instance, in Hursthouse’s discussion of Abortion and in her essay on virtue theory (Ethical Theory). However, some critics think virtue theory is irreparably flawed, for example, Doris (Punishment). He claims that any robust virtue theory rests on a defective moral psychology.

Feminist theory

Historically most philosophers were men; most embraced the sexism of their respective cultures. Thus, it is not surprising that women’s interests and perspectives played no role in the development of standard ethical theories. Does that mean these theories are useless? Or can they be salvaged? Can we merely prune Aristotle’s explicit sexism from his theory and still have an Aristotelian theory that is adequate for a less sexist age? Can we remove Kant’s sexism and have a non-sexist deontology?

In the early years of feminism, many thinkers thought so. They claimed that the standard ethical theories’ emphasis on justice, equality, and fairness offer all the argumentative ammunition women need to claim their rightful place in the public world. Others were not so sure. Carol Gilligan (1982) argued that women have different moral experiences and different moral reasoning, and that these differences must be incorporated into our understanding of morality. She advocated an “Ethics of Care,” which she claimed best exemplified women’s experience and thinking. However, other feminists claimed this view too closely resembles old-fashioned views of women. What we need instead, they claim, are theories that have a keen awareness of gender and a concern to develop all people’s unique human capacities (Jaggar, 2000).

Observe the ways that issues concerning women are discussed (Sexual and Racial Discrimination, Affirmative Action, and Abortion, Free Speech, and Family and Sexuality). See whether the reasons used differ from those employed in other essays. If so, how?

Conclusion

As you read the following essays, you will see how these different ways of thinking about ethics shape our deliberations about particular moral issues. Be alert to these theoretical differences. They will help you better understand the essays. Also pay close attention to the section introductions. These highlight the theoretical issues that play a central role within that section.
References

Reading Philosophy

Reading philosophy differs from reading science fiction or the daily newspaper. The subjects are different; the purposes are different; the styles are different. Science fiction attempts to transport us imaginatively to distant worlds of larger-than-life heroes and villains. It aims to entertain us, to divert us from the doldrums of our daily lives, and perhaps even to empower us: having seen the glories or evils of worlds not yet experienced, we may be better equipped to live in our everyday world. Science fiction achieves these aims by spinning a convincing narrative of creatures living in previously unknown worlds; it evokes our imaginative powers through expressive language.

Newspapers inform us of significant political, social, cultural, economic, and climatic events. Once we are informed, we can presumably make better decisions about our leaders, our finances, and our social lives. The media typically achieves these aims by giving us the facts, just the facts. They usually present these facts in a pithy writing style.

Philosophers have neither the direct aims of the journalist nor the airy aims of the science fiction novelist. Their primary function is not to inform or to inspire, but to help us explore competing ideas and the reasons for them. The philosopher achieves these aims by employing a writing style that tends to be neither pithy nor expressive. The style likely differs from any to which you are accustomed.

Philosophical Language

While the reporter and the novelist write for the public, philosophers usually write for one other. Thus, while most newspapers and some science fiction are written for an eighth grade audience, philosophical essays are written for people with university training. That is why you will need a more robust vocabulary to understand a philosophical essay than you will to understand the latest novel or a column in the local paper. So keep a dictionary handy to look up “ordinary” words you may not yet know. You will also face an additional problem with these essays’ vocabularies. Philosophy, like all academic disciplines, employs specialized terms. Some of these are familiar words with specialized meanings; others are words unique to the discipline. To fully grasp philosophical writing, you will need to understand both. Do not despair. Often you can roughly determine the term’s meaning from its context. If, after doing your best, you still cannot understand its meaning, ask your instructor. Most of these words can be explained in a clear, non-technical way. You can also consult the online philosophical dictionary (see the link on this book’s supporting web page: www.hughlafolette.com/eip3/).

Philosophical writing also tends to be more complex than the writings of reporters and novelists. Occasionally it is more complex than it needs to be: the author may not know how to write clearly. Sometimes the essay seems more complex than it is since the author wrote decades or even centuries ago when most writers penned long, intricate sentences. You can often break down these long sentences into their component parts, for example, by treating a semicolon as a period. You may also need to reread the essay several times to get a sense of the author’s rhythm, much in the way that you may need to listen to a musician several times before you find it easy to appreciate her music and understand the lyrics.

Often, though, the writing is complex simply because the ideas expressed are complex. We cannot always render profound thoughts into intellectual pabulum. The only way to grasp such essays is to generally improve one’s reading skills, in large part by reading and rereading essays until you understand them.

The Centrality of Argument

Philosophical writing is complex also because it contains and evaluates arguments. Philosophers forward their own arguments and critique the arguments of others. “Arguments,” in this context, have a particular philosophical sense: An argument is a connected series of statements with some central claim the writer is trying to defend (the conclusion), supported by evidence (the premises) the author offers on behalf of the conclusion. The evidence philosophers use varies. They may proffer empirical data, forward imaginative examples, pose suggestions, and critique alternatives. Make certain you have identified the author’s conclusion and her premises before you evaluate her work. Do not fall into the trap of judging that an argument is bad simply because you dislike the conclusion.

This tendency to dismiss views we dislike helps explain philosophers’ concern with arguments. Each of us is constantly bombarded with claims. Some of these claims are true, some false. Some offer sage wisdom; some, dreadful advice. How do we distinguish the true from the false, the wise from the stupid – especially when the topic is a controversial moral, political, and social issue? How do we know the proper moral response to abortion, world hunger, same-sex marriage, and affirmative action? Do we just pick the one we like; the one our parents, preachers, teachers, and our pals told us? Often that is exactly what we do. But we shouldn’t. Even a cursory glance at history reveals that many horrendous evils were committed by those who embraced their views steadfastly and uncritically. Most Nazis, slave holders, and commanders of Russian gulags did not think they were immoral; they assumed they were doing the right thing. They simply accepted their society’s views without subjecting them to rational scrutiny. That we should not do. At least not if we are responsible individuals. After all, people’s lives, welfare, and happiness may depend on our decisions, and the decisions of people like us.

What is our option? We should seek conclusions supported by the best evidence. We should examine the reasons offered for alternative beliefs. Doing so will not insure that we make the best decision, but it will increase the odds that we do. It will lessen the possibility that we make highly objectionable decisions, decisions we will later come to regret. Philosophers offer arguments for their views to help themselves and others make better decisions.

Most people are unaccustomed to scrutinizing arguments. Since most of us were taught to believe what our parents, our priests, our teachers, and our pals told us, we are disinclined to consider the arguments of others seriously, or to rationally criticize our own views. Moreover, although all of us have offered some arguments for our views, we have rarely done so with the care and depth that are the staples of good philosophy. Philosophers strive to offer a clear, unambiguous conclusion supported by reasons that even those disinclined to believe her conclusions are likely to find persuasive. That is not to say that philosophers never make bad arguments or say stupid things. Of course we do. However, it is to say that the explicit aim of philosophy is a clear, careful, assessment of the reasons for and against ours and others’ views. That is why a key to understanding philosophy is being able to spot arguments, and then to critique them. That is something you will learn, at least in part, by practice.

Looking at Others’ Views

Since part of the task of defending one’s view is to show that it is rationally superior to alternatives, a philosopher usually not only (a) provides arguments for her view, she will also (b) respond to criticisms of that view, and (c) consider alternative perspectives. Sometimes those other views and criticisms are advocated by a specific philosopher whose work the author cites. Often, though, the view the author discusses is not that of any particular philosopher, but rather the view of some hypothetical advocate of a position (e.g., conservatism or theism or pro-life). This is often double trouble for a student. You may be unfamiliar with the view being discussed. Since you do not know if the view has been accurately represented, you cannot judge if the criticisms (and responses to them) are telling. Worse, you may have trouble distinguishing the author’s view from the views of those she discusses.

If you read quickly, and without concentrating, you may be confused. However, usually you can distinguish one view from the other if you read the essay carefully. Most authors give argumentative road signs indicating